In 2001, Robert Chody, at the time an officer with the Austin Police Department, was charged with the brutal arrest of Marcus Dewayne Frank, a black teenager, who the Austin Chronicle's Patricia J. Ruland said was as "an exemplary student" at a local high school.

...Ruland, who noted that the claims against Chody appeared to have "considerable merit," reported on the disturbing events that unfolded in August 1998, as described in court documents:

...Chody stood accused of beating a much smaller 15-year-old black teenager in East Austin, smashing the youth's face on the hood of a patrol car, putting him in a "full nelson" (a forceful, immobilizing wrestling hold that places pressure on the neck), triggering a seizure in the terrified youth and bruising his ribs - and finally arresting [Marcus] without apparent probable cause.

...The City of Austin quietly settled the case in April 2001, and Chody resigned from his post that June. He has served as an Austin precinct constable since being elected to the position in November 2008.

Now, Chody is organizing Austin's "Police Lives Matter" rally and accusing the Black Lives Matter movement of criminal violence. He's also blocked dozens of potential critics from viewing the event's Facebook page, including this reporter and many Facebook users who have signed up for an anti-police brutality march and a Black Lives Matter Austin rally scheduled for the same day as the Austin pro-police rally.
